

Reviewing the brain differences between men and women

One of the great fascinations of being in love is having found someone like us – where there is a mutual understanding of one another. But, as those golden glow moments change over time, we find this person to be less like us than we thought. Our expectations based on similarities begin to fall apart and each finds there are more differences than imagined.

Anyone who can explain to us why our mates do the things we once loved but now drive us crazy would be a godsend. There are numerous sources to turn to for relationship advice, but few go directly to the source – the brain.

If you're looking for a quick and immediate explanation then the video below is for you.

Dr. Daniel Amen, a leading brain researcher and host of a number of programs on PBS about how you can improve the health of your brain is being interviewed by the female, co-hosts of The View.

The interview segment is a little over seven minutes and really not enough time to explain everything, but you will hear about the major brain gender differences. Also the co-hosts are asking the key questions that most women want answers to. Unfortunately, this interview is rather one-sided without any men participating from the audience. However, the exchange between the female co-hosts and Dr. Amen does clearly demonstrate the gender differences in language skills between men and women.

Take a look and see if you agree.
